

Public spaces and architecture as manifestations of a territory

How are built forms a manifestation of the environment in which they are embedded? By their morphologies, the assembly of their materials, their degrees of openness, their relationship to the landscape and ground, buildings and public spaces have the power to reveal the specificities of a territory. Through the presentation of several built projects carried out in the bio-region of the Massif Central in France, the session will deal with the local dimension of public spaces and buildings and with their capacity to carry out more global themes which animate the reflection of the Rouget workshop.
